

Thus the recorded story of the life of Es-kim-in-zin had its inception in misfortune and tragedy—and the unkindly fates persistently followed him to the end.

Es-kim-in-zin's ardent desire for peace was subjected to the acid test on that "bright morning of April 30, 1871,"—and he was not found wanting, for as soon as he had recovered from the shock of the awful horrors of the massacre and its consequent grief, he returned to the post and reiterated his desire for peace and his confidence in Lieutenant Whitman.
